

Statement:

Moving away from one's place of birth and adolescence more importantly, preserves the memory of a certain scent or association that renders colorless and odorless in a place with long winters and dormant vegetation. Power of the memory itself colors the emotions and lends warmth to an otherwise mundane, unfamiliar situation. Such disjointed associations and allegiances become second nature and a way of life.